CASES

Attendance: Requiring Employee to Follow Her Treatment Plan Isn't Psychological Harassment

An employer with a self-insured health plan learned that an employee on medical leave due to depression and anxiety wasn't taking the antipsychotic drug prescribed by her physician. Unless and until you send us proof of your intent to take the medications, we're treating your leave as an unauthorized absence, the employer told her. The employee refused and the union claimed psychological harassment. The Québec arbitrator dismissed the grievance. While the wording and timing of the demand was a bit clunky, the employer's insistence that the employee follow her treatment plan wasn't psychological harassment but a legitimate exercise of management authority [Union of Public and Parapublic Employees of Quebec v. Quebec Revenue Agency, 2023 CanLII 10885 (QC SAT), February 10, 2023].

COVID-19: OK to Suspend Teacher During Investigation of Classroom Face Mask Complaint

The written warning that the school issued to a first-grade teacher for not enforcing the face mask rules in the classroom during the COVID-19 pandemic was a bitter pill to swallow. But what really angered the union is that the school suspended the teacher for 4 weeks while it investigated the matter. The union claimed this was a double penalty but the Québec arbitrator disagreed, noting that the suspension in connection with the investigation was an administrative rather than a disciplinary action, the school needed time to get to the bottom of what happened and the teacher was paid for her time while on suspension [Syndicat de l'enseignement de la région de Québec \(FAE\) v Center de services scolaire de la Capitale, 2023 CanLII 5471 (QC SAT), January 31, 2023].
